THE BUDDHIST FORUM
VOLUME IV
Contents

Preface

Abbreviations

T.H. Barrett, SOAS
The Fate of Buddhist Political Thought in China: The Rajah Dons a Disguise..1

S. Batchelor, Sharpham, Devon
Existence, Enlightenment, and Suicide: The Dilemma of Nanavira Thera......9

L.S. Cousins, Manchester
The Origin of Insight Meditation.......................................................................35

J.B. Disanayaka, SOAS/University of Colombo
Buddhist Values of the Traditional Sinhala Village...........................................59

S. Gaffney, SOAS
The Pāli Nīdānakathā and its Tibetan Translation: Its Textual Precursors and Associated Literature.................................................................75

D. Gillman, National Gallery of Victoria, Melbourne
General Munthe's Chinese Buddhist Sculpture: An Embarrassment of Riches?......................................................................................................93

I. Harris, University of Lancaster
The American Appropriation of Buddhism.......................................................125

A. Huxley, SOAS
The Vinaya: Legal System or Performance-Enhancing Drug?.........................141

B. Siklós, SOAS
The Evolution of the Buddhist Yama................................................................165

T. Skorupski, SOAS
The Samputa-tantra: Sanskrit and Tibetan Versions of Chapter One.............191

G. Watson, SOAS
Buddhist Foundations for Modern Psychotherapy..........................................245

Bibliography......................................................................................................275
Ever since their introduction in 1987, the Buddhist Forum seminars continue to offer an interesting and stimulating variety of papers on Buddhist topics. The seminars are regularly convened once a month during term time and they attract a regular and handsome group of people from SOAS and outside. During the past years we have been fortunate to have discussed an excellent number of papers presented by SOAS staff members and invited speakers from other universities and institutions in this country, and visiting scholars from other countries in Europe and overseas. The majority of the papers presented at the Buddhist Forum have been published in the past three volumes. The present volume, like the previous ones, offers an attractive selection of papers some of which deal with contemporary issues and some cover topics appertaining to the mainstream classical research.

The universities and academic institutions in this country do not always have comfortable financial resources to sustain and fully develop their academic and other relevant potentials. The publications of academic books, journals and seminar papers are a good example how difficult it is to secure funds so that they can be published on a regular basis. Bearing all such things in mind, the School of Oriental and African Studies deserves words of gratitude for continuing to publish the Buddhist Forum papers.

While preparing this volume for publication I have received help with typing and some editorial work from my students Joss Winn and Joanna Mazur. I wish to record here my gratitude for their assistance. I would also like to thank the Publications Committee for accepting this volume for publication, and to Martin Daly for his professional advice in various matters relating to publishing, and for seeing this volume through its publication stages.

Tadeusz Skorupski
14 January, 1996.
Abbreviations

AO Archiv Orientalni
BEFEQ Bulletin de l’Ecole Française d’Extême-Orient
BMFEA Bulletin of the Museum of the Far Eastern Antiquities
BMQ The British Museum Quarterly
BR Brackwell Review
BS(BK) Buddhist Studies (Bukkyō Kenkyū)
CAJ Central Asiatic Journal
CUP Cambridge University Press
EB Eastern Buddhist
EFEO l’École Française d’Extême-Orient
HR History of Religions
ILJ Indo-Iranian Journal
JA Journal Asiaticque
JAAS Journal of Asian and African Studies
JIABS Journal of the International Association of Buddhist Studies
JIBS Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies
JLS Journal of Law and Society
JPTS Journal of the Pali Text Society
JTP Journal of Transpersonal Psychology
OUP Oxford University Press
PEFEO Publications de l’École Française d’Extême-Orient
PEW Philosophy East & West
PR Partisan Review
PS Process Studies
PTS Pali Text Society
Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>RHR</td>
<td>Revue de l'histoire des Religions</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBB</td>
<td>Sacred Books of the Buddhists</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBE</td>
<td>Sacred Books of the East</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SIS</td>
<td>Sino-Indian Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SO</td>
<td>Studia Orientalia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WZKS</td>
<td>Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde Süd- und Ostasiens</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ZVS</td>
<td>Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachforschung</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
In political matters the Buddha was, it must be admitted, a bit of a bolshie; for whatever the spiritual significance of his renunciation of palace life, his life story can also be read as a comment on the value of hereditary monarchy as well. Either as a result of their founder's personal rejection of kingship, or because of Buddhism's early development in parts of ancient India where monarchical government was not itself an established institution, the Buddha's later followers for some time seem to have taken a similarly dim view of autocracy. But over the long centuries of the religion's coexistence with Asian autocrats this aspect of Buddhism has, I would suggest, become less self-evident, and as a result has been surprisingly little researched. In 1974 Hubert Durt published in Japan's Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies an article which deserves to be better known on the use of the counting-stick in Buddhism, apparently as a relic of distant times when Buddhist communities decided their affairs on a straight vote. But as far as I am aware, though a connection between Buddhism and democracy had indeed been vaunted yet earlier in research based on a (somewhat problematic) reading of South Asian materials, very little further work has been done in quite this vein, at least on those early Buddhist materials preserved in East Asia.

It therefore came as a considerable shock to me recently when I was able to devote a couple of hours to chasing up references to 'local magistrates' (in Chinese, hsien-kuan) in the Chinese Buddhist Canon. Though I cannot claim as yet to have carried out a full survey, it seems quite clear that in Buddhist materials translated into Chinese, from the earliest times onwards, local magistrates are viewed in an extremely negative light. They are indeed most frequently grouped with bandits as a potential threat to property or worse, and the prospect of unjust imprisonment by them appears to have been considered such a high risk that many Buddhist texts or practices (such as invocations to Bodhisattvas and so forth) are recommended as having the effect of a 'Get Out of Jail Free' card. The reason for my shock may perhaps not be so obvious to an Indologist, but in a Chinese historiographic tradition written (as has long been recognised) almost exclusively by bureaucrats for bureaucrats, the sinologist does not expect to find even a trace of anti-bureaucratic feeling, except in government reports of the beliefs of peasant rebels, which are usually cast in a highly unsympathetic light.

True, negative remarks about magistrates do not feature strongly (if at all) in the sūtras most commonly read in China, and one may perhaps surmise that this totally unexpected subaltern point of view on monarchical government barred certain sūtras from acceptability with influential patrons. But the materials still exist, and were evidently not subjected to censorship, as for example it has been claimed some texts were for reasons of Confucian prudery when translated from Indian languages. This has encouraged me to bring forward some further evidence which suggests that another Buddhist political belief relating to central rather than to local government was perhaps seen as more threatening, but that materials demonstrating exactly how that threat was countered also still exist in the Chinese Buddhist Canon. But rather than start with the contemporary canon, we should perhaps first take a look at the contemporary Chinese Buddhist monastery.

The title yūeh-chung as used in Chinese Buddhism today signifies a monastic office of moderate importance. Holmes Welch, in his classic description of modern Chinese monasticism, finds the closest analogous term in Western monasticism to be ‘succentor’, an office junior to the more important administrative post of ‘precentor’. In former times, however, yūeh-chung was one of the terms used in the hierarchy of offices imposed over the years on Buddhism by a succession of Chinese dynasties anxious to provide a level of state control which, as the Chinese pilgrim I-ching (635-713) found to his evident surprise, was quite different from the much less structured arrangements which prevailed in South Asia even at the lowest level of the individual monastery. But if we consult dictionaries, standard historical surveys, even monographs on the Chinese Buddhist hierarchy, we are repeatedly told that the term yūeh-chung, literally meaning ‘pleasing the masses’, is simply an alternative translation of the Sanskrit karmadāna.

1. Holmes Welch, The Practice of Chinese Buddhism, Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1967, 422-3; some of the duties of this office are described e.g. on 44.
3. Most recently, for example, the Fo-kuang ta-tz'u-tien, Kao-hsiung, Fo-kuang ch'u-pan-she, 1988, II, 4110.
The Fate of Buddhist Political Thought in China

This latter term was certainly well known to the Chinese, since it too was used (in abbreviated transliteration) for one of the other posts in the hierarchy - one now equivalent to Welch's 'precentor'. What is more, the Chinese seem to have known (to their satisfaction, if not to that of the contemporary Indologist) precisely what karmadāna meant, since they also translate the term, either as 'manager of affairs' or 'assigner of tasks'. But the authority for stating that yüeh-chung translates karmadāna, which it patently does not, derives, as far as I have been able to discover, solely from an assertion on this point by the Buddhist historian Tsan-ning (919-1001) in his institutional history of Chinese Buddhism, the Seng-shih lüeh. It should be pointed out that Tsan-ning, for all his erudition, was never known as a master of Indian languages; the alleged equivalence between yüeh-chung and karmadāna can only be put down to simple error.

But what Sanskrit, if any, does this term meaning 'crowd-pleaser' translate? The only Indian administrative office known to me which was ever deemed to have such a meaning is that described by A. L. Basham:

"He was called 'the Great Chosen One' (Mahāsammata), and he received the title of rājā because he pleased the people. The derivation of the word rājā from the verb rañjayati ('he pleases') is certainly a false one, but it was widely maintained and is found even in non-Buddhist sources."

Basham is, of course, summarizing from a well-known passage in the Dīgha-nikāya on the myth of the 'Great Elect', the primal ruler figure in the Buddhist conception of the contractual origins of kingship. More recent writing on this topic has echoed Basham's summary in stressing the ubiquity of the myth and its attendant etymologising, both in Buddhist sources, and also beyond. Less

6. See the references given above in note 1.
7. See for example the explanation given by I-ching, cited in note 2 above.
13. Note the materials brought forward by Richard Gombrich, on page 174 of "The Buddha's Book of Genesis?", III, 35, 1992, 159-178, and also page 176, note 9, for another dimension of recent interest in this passage.
T.H. Barrett

has been said about Chinese materials, though Western scholarship has been aware for some time that this myth and the etymology here associated with it were also known in China. Samuel Beal summarizes one such passage as early as 1875, perhaps without fully understanding its purport; his source is in any case too late a translation to bear upon the origins of the term yüeh-chung.14 In 1908 Edouard Huber published a translation of a further passage not alluding to Mahāsammata but explaining the word 'king' as meaning one who 'spreads his benefits in the universe' (evidently a toning down of the Indian etymology to suit Chinese sensibilities),15 but his confidence in the ascription of the Chinese translation of his text to the famous early fifth century translator Kumarajiva has not been vindicated by more recent research, which again would suggest that it comes too late to enter into discussion here.16

More recently, however, Konrad Meisig has dealt with the Dīgha-nikāya passage in three Chinese parallel versions,17 in the course of an attempted reconstruction of the original state of this material—an attempt which has, however, not been universally accepted.18 While one of his Chinese texts is again far too late to concern us,19 a Madhyamāgama parallel passage does seem to antedate the appearance of the term yüeh-chung some time shortly before A.D. 401,20 since the Chinese translation dates to A.D. 400 even in the finished form in which we now have it.21 As it stands, however, the direct etymological

17. K. Meisig, Das Sūtra von der vier Ständen: Das Aggañña-Sutta im Licht sein chinesischen Parallelen, Wiesbaden, Otto Harrasowitz, 1988, 144-5, lays out the parallels; his comments may be found on page 25.

18. See the remarks of Richard Gombrich on this study contained in the article cited above, note 13; both references courtesy of Professor K. R. Norman.

19. This is because it dates from the Sung period. It is by no means the only later text in Chinese to mention either the origins of kingship, the etymology for king, or both at once. In fact, Mahāsammata was eventually to enter Chinese discourse on kingship via the alien dynasties of conquest: see Herbert Franke, From Tribal Chieftain to Universal Emperor and God, Münich, Verlag der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1978, 55, 64, 68 n. 137. This study is concerned with the possibility of an admittedly strangely distorted but much earlier impact of the myth.

The Fate of Buddhist Political Thought in China

association between kingship and pleasure-giving is obscured in the Chinese by the presence (interpolation?) of other remarks, even if it is detectably present.22
This is more than can be said for the earliest version of Basha m's passage translated, the Ta-lou-hui ching, dating to about A.D. 300, which gives no etymology for the title rajah in any form.23

Clarity, however, was not long in coming. The entire Dirghāgama (plus another account of Mahāsammata in the Dharmaguptaka Vinaya)24 was rendered into Chinese by a translation team by A.D. 411.25 Of the two accounts of Mahāsammata in the former collection, one, already noted by Meisig, quite clearly reproduces the false etymology, even if the term yueh-chung does not occur:

“At that time that one man (Mahāsammata) further with wonderful words consoled the mass of the people (chung-min). When the mass of the people heard this they all rejoiced greatly, and all together proclaimed him, saying ‘Wonderful, O Great King! Wonderful, O Great King!’ At this the world then had the title of king.”26

Of the members of the translation team responsible for this passage, Buddhayasas, teacher of Kumarajiva, had only arrived in China in A.D. 408,27 but his partner Chu Fo-nien had already been hard at work through the late fourth century.28 Given the strong interest in the Āgamas during this period, which had (as we have seen) already witnessed the translation of the Madhyāgama (and indeed the Ekottarāgama) into finished, revised versions by A.D. 400, it would not be surprising if the content of this portion of the Dīrghāgama was already known and discussed, and perhaps even translated in draft, well before A.D. 401, even if a finished translation did not appear until over a decade later.

22. The passage in question is in the Taishō Canon, vol. 1, p.676a, col.19-22, as Meisig’s listing of parallels shows.
23. Ta-lou-hui ching, 6, 308c, in Taishō Canon, vol. 1, no.23. The translators involved did attract later false attributions of translations to their names, but this is one of their genuine products, attested in the earliest sources: cf. Erik Zürcher, The Buddhist Conquest of China, 70, and Tokiwa Daijō, GoKan yori Sō, Sei ni tiaru yakkyō sōrōku, Tokyo, Tōhō bunka gakuin Tōkyō kenkyūjo, 1938, 879.
24. The famous Ssu-fen lü, 31, 779a in Taishō Canon, vol. 22, no. 1428; note, however, that this text does speak of the ‘Great Elect’ being raised up by the masses chung.
25. Tokiwa, Yakkyō sōrōku, 879.
26. Ch’ang O-han, 6, 38b-c, in Taishō Canon, vol. 1, no. 1; cf also 22, 148c in the same text.
27. See Richard Robinson, Early Mādhyamika in India and China, Madison, Wisconsin, Wisconsin University Press, 1968, 72, which cites the older man’s Chinese biography for the friendship between the two, and Zürcher, Buddhist Conquest, 408,
n. 71.
But maybe such an assumption is both slightly problematic, and completely unnecessary. Meisig's meticulous glossary of the materials he is interested in shows at any rate that the word yueh is never associated with kingship in his texts: where the pleasure etymology is introduced, entirely different synonyms are always used. But if, following Gombrich, we read the whole myth as a joke, and the etymology as "surely yet another joke", then was it not equally surely (in the light of the ubiquity of references to it) a joke on everyone's lips, likely to cross linguistic boundaries without depending on the formal assistance of translation teams? If Tsan-ning did not get the joke, then that was either because he did not live in a time and place subject to such strong Central Asian Buddhist influence as Ch'ang-an in A.D. 400, or else (and this is not impossible) because it was simply impolitic for him to understand it.

There remains, of course, the matter of motive in turning the joke back on to the Buddhists by distorting its meaning so utterly. Why press this term into service in constructing a monastic hierarchy? Here we can only resort to speculation, but it has been noted by most historians that Yao Hsing, the local potentate who was Kumarajiva's patron and the sponsor of much of the translation activity of this period, was nothing if not an autocrat, hardly likely to welcome the contractual model of kingship presented in these texts. He himself carried the title t'ien-wang, literally equivalent to devarāja, though the term has been explained as harking back to early Chinese usage associated with a more loosely knit polity, and it may carry Inner Asian overtones too, suggesting a link between rulership and the sky god. The learned monks under his patronage were however in contact with their colleagues living under the Chin dynasty in the South, where the famous Hui-yüan (334-417) was just at this point articulating his reasons for defending the autonomy of the saṅgha against the threat of state control. 34 Might it not be that Yao Hsing was prepared to see contractual leadership as part of Buddhism, on the understanding that it applied only within the Buddhist domain of the saṅgha itself? Such sleight of hand may even have been encouraged by the fact that the word chung, ‘masses’, while clearly referring in translations of the Mahāsammata story to the primeval population of the earth, was often used as a translation for saṅgha.35

It is hardly likely that any materials might ever come to hand either to confirm or deny such a hypothesis, but we cannot rule out the possibility that at this extraordinary epoch when the relationships between Buddhist and East Asian political traditions were subject to vigorous debate, the initiative of one particularly unpleasant ruler ensured the survival of the Indian etymology for rajah in a completely unlikely Chinese context. As we know, the notion of democracy in any sense tends to find powerful enemies in China (even if, ironically enough, Yao Hsing was in contemporary ethnic terms more Tibetan than Chinese); perhaps it is now time for this ‘political prisoner’ detained in monastic confinement to be recognised.

---

35. For instance in the Chinese version of the Udānavarga translated by Chu Fo-nien as the Ch’u-yao ching, 701c in Taishō Canon, vol. 4, no. 212, to take an example from materials contemporary with those under discussion. It occurs to me on rereading this paper that the term upon which the Chinese “crowdpleaser” might be based could therefore be sangha rāja, but I am not so far aware of any use of this title known to the Chinese at such an early date, and so hesitate to modify the conclusions given above.
Bibliography

Bibliography

Bizot, F., Les traditions de la pabbajjā en Asie du Sud-Est, Recherches sur le bouddhisme khmer IV, Abhandlungen der Akademie der
Bibliography

Bibliography

Cattālayo, Phra Wai, Brightness of Dhamma, Bangkok, Mr Chuan Somsongkram, 1986.

Chattopadhyaya, D., ed. & tr., Tārānātha’s History of Buddhism in India, Calcutta, 1980.

278
Bibliography

Dhirasekera, J., "The Rebels against the Codified Law in Buddhist Monastic Discipline", BS(BK), 1, 1970, 90-77.

Bibliography

Fields, R., How the Swans Came to the Lake: A Narrative History of Buddhism in America, Boston & London, Shambhala, 1992, 64.

Franke, H., From Tribal Chieftain to Universal Emperor and God, München, Verlag der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1978.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Bibliography

Bibliography

Bibliography

Bibliography

Bibliography

Olerud, A., L’idée de macrocosmos et de microcosmos dans le Timée de Platon, Uppsala, 1951.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Windisch, W.O.E., Māra und Buddha, Leipzig, 1895.

291
Bibliography

